Loyola's Young Lawyers Program Receives ABA Public Interest Award

Los Angeles – Loyola Law School's Judge Stephen O'Neil Trial Advocacy Mentoring Program was awarded the 2008 American Bar Association Judy M. Weightman Award. The ABA annually bestows the honor on a law student program for its outstanding contributions to underrepresented groups or public interest causes outside the law school.

Known as The Young Lawyers Program, the mentoring initiative was established in 2000 by Loyola's La Raza student group and Black Law Students Association. Advised by Professors Gary Williams and Brietta Clark, law students plan the program, recruit the high school students, teach the lessons, select the trial problem and coach the trial teams. The goal is to expose at-risk youth of color to the benefits of obtaining an advanced degree.

"Loyola is dedicated to providing opportunities for legal education to the poor, the underprivileged, women and minorities," said Williams. "The Young Lawyers Program, founded by Loyola's African American and Latino student organizations and staffed by students of all races, fulfills that mission by bringing inner-city high school students to Loyola's campus to teach them about the law, legal advocacy and the importance of a college education."

Each Thursday of the spring semester, Loyola Law students teach their protégés an array of lawyer skills: how to prepare witnesses, conduct direct and cross examination, handle evidence issues and present opening statements and closing arguments. The program culminates in a mock trial before LA Superior Court judges. This year, that group included the Hon. John Meigs '78, Hon. Terry Smerling and Hon. Alan B. Honeycutt.

The program is named in honor of the late Judge Stephen O'Neil of the LA County Superior Court. During the first two years of Young Lawyers, Judge O'Neil graciously donated his time and expertise by serving as judge for the mock trial.

Dean Victor Gold said, "This program is a great example of what Loyola Law School is all about – combining excellence in education with devotion to public service. Steve O'Neil would be proud."
